

zinc finger proteins in pdf

Description : Devoted to the role zinc-finger proteins play in the regulation of transcription and oncogenesis, this book includes material on functional domains of DNA-binding zinc-finger proteins, structure and function of zinc fingers, zinc-finger protein mutants, transcription activation mechanisms, and control and loss of gene transcription.

By arranging two cysteines and two histidines close to each other in a chain, a protein can grab a zinc ion and fold tightly around it. In these proteins, termed zinc fingers, a short chain of 20-30 amino acids is enough to create a solid, stable structure.

PDB-101: Molecule of the Month: Zinc Fingers

Zinc finger protein (ZFP) possesses one or more "zinc finger"™ that bond one or more zinc ions by its residues Histidine (His) and Cysteine (Cys). ZFP also belongs to a large family of transcription factor. It plays many important regulatory roles in plants.

Most zinc finger proteins contain multiple fingers, allowing longer sequences to be recognized to increase specificity. A related structure is present in the steroid hormone receptor family, although in this case, four cysteine residues coordinate the zinc ion and the finger is composed of two helices rather than one.

Zinc Finger Proteins Designed To Specifically Target Duck

Zinc finger proteins are the largest transcription factor family in human genome. The diverse combinations and functions of zinc finger motifs make zinc finger proteins versatile in biological processes, including development, differentiation, metabolism and autophagy.

Zinc finger proteins in cancer progression | Journal of Dof is a novel family of plant proteins that share a unique and highly conserved DNA binding domain with one C2-C2 zinc finger motif. Although multiple Dof proteins associated with diverse gene promoters have recently been identified in a variety of plants, their physiological functions and regulation remain elusive.
